Motivation and wound

Two characters and what drives them. Lawrence carries the story of The Reveal. Agam stands across the arena in The Power Brigade.

Lawrence

Lawrence lives in a world where a scientific accident, by mistake, drew aside the veil that hid Divinity. In consequence, the Angry Gods condemned humanity and warned that what waits for them in the world beyond will be, without exception, endless torture. Lawrence has a special power, as many others in this world do after the Unveiling, one that lets him swap places with a version of himself from a parallel world. Even so, he cannot stay there more than a few minutes before he is forced back into his own world.

What does he want most?

One simple thing above all: freedom. Everything around him reminds him that he is a prisoner of his own life. He is forced to work in a place he does not want to be, he is stuck in a country he cannot leave, and the escapes from the present, alcohol, drugs, virtual realities, are heavily regulated and held down by the powers of the state.

What does he truly need?

To learn to enjoy the small things he already has, and to build something of his own, instead of chasing something he believes will finally satisfy him.

What is the wound that shapes his life?

Loneliness, the isolation he has felt since he was a small child, pushed to the margins for his family's lack of money and standing.

What lie about the world does he believe because of that wound?

That life is decided at birth. If you are born in a good place you will have a good life, if you are born in a bad place you will have a miserable one.

What frightens him most?

Death, or rather a premature death. And worse than that, a death that draws laughter from the people around him. There is also the fear of waste. He is afraid of squandering the chance he has to live in so many new and different ways, and so he will not let himself put a foot wrong and risk his potential.

What decision does he avoid at all costs?

Standing out, or doing anything that draws attention, out of a wish not to put himself in needless danger. It is the same thing that keeps him from ever truly changing his life.

What is his greatest contradiction?

He can live countless versions of his life with his power, and yet he treats them as illusions rather than part of his own experience. He is blind to the journey, because he is always fixed on the end point, death and the ultimate pain.

What truth about himself will he be forced to accept by the end?

That his ordinary life is the one that suits him best out of all the worlds he could live, and to make peace, on his own, with the fault of not being the best version of himself.

Agam

Agam is the son of the Emperor of the Central City, chosen against his will for a band of heroes sworn to serve the Realm and protect it from anything that would destroy it.

What does he want most?

For his power to be recognized across the whole Realm, to be acknowledged, and to stay a living legend in the mind of every creature in the world.

What does he truly need?

Friends who will stay beside him even when he is not strong and does not know what to do.

What is the wound that shapes his life?

His father's shadow, the certainty that the people will never see him as a better emperor than his father, who gathered the Kingdoms of Men into a single union, the Central City, to protect humanity through the Magic Wars. Being reminded, over and over, that he cannot be like his father built an enormous need to be recognized.

What lie about the world does he believe because of that wound?

That this world has no room for everyone, and that if you do not seize a place quickly, you will be forgotten and become nothing.

What frightens him most?

Being ordinary, unremarkable, uninspired, the same as everyone else. Because if he is like everyone else, how will he ever be valued?

What decision does he avoid at all costs?

Anything that could endanger his standing over others, from resting more than he has to, all the way to sparing those who might one day surpass him.

What is his greatest contradiction?

He could have been a loved and respected emperor if he had led a normal, honest life in his father's steps. Not at once, perhaps, but one day people would have valued him as much as he needed. And still he will not allow it, out of fear that it would not be enough.

What truth about himself will he be forced to accept by the end?

That fulfillment comes also from valuing himself, and that no one is asking him to be anything more than he wants to be, so he is free to simply live the life he wants.
